Throughout this quarter a lot has happened and a lots been written. From essays about real world problems to every day issues, its been entertaining. I think the most important factor in writing an essay is the motivation and how a person feels on the issue or tip of they are writing about. For me through my essays it should be easy to see that motivation, knowledge, and writing ability run throughout.

To start, my two favorite essays. The first one was about the Internet, and was a expository essay. This one interested me because it's something I use everyday, and was informative because I explored the issues that went along with it. My other favorite essay was my research essay. I liked this one because it was definitely a common issue of police brutality. I actually liked writing about it because some had to do with my opinion.

My research essay was actually really easy to me, it's was an easy, well known subject. And it wasn't very hard to find information about it, and that helped with it being easy. I wouldn't say anyone really helped me because I did most of it on my own, but I do have a paragraph in there which was all basically my opinion. That was my favorite part about the essay because I consider myself pretty well informed about what's going on in the world so to write about it actually helps clarify to me that I know what I'm talking about.

In this entire year I would have to say again that my research paper was my favorite. It just exploits how I think and feel about such a current day issue. But wow, thought this year I did write a ton of essays. But in reality only a few stuck out because obviously a lot of them were on things that don't matter to me or really have anything to do with the world, which is obviously what I'm interested in writing. So in general I still think I'm a pretty good writer, I think I said that in the beginning of the year too. Ya, I think I'll stick with that statement.

In all this year has been full of writing essays and reading books I'll probably forget in a month, but I know it's required and it what I have to do and that's fine. All that matters is that whenever we had to write essays on something I don't and still don't care about, I did it with excellence. I think the lowest ever being like an eighty five or something, and to me and eighty five is low on an essay but it's fine, because in majority I did well on most. But overall I would say that this year was pretty successful, didn't learn much on writing any different, but defiantly explored new topics.
