Thought the second quarter I think I've improved greatly in some areas, and I still know of a few that will always need fixing. I think I need to fix how I write topic sentences, but other than that I give enough detail, and start my essays strongly. I felt inspired while writing an essay on the accounts of slave narratives for Frederick Douglass and Harriet Jacobs. It brought out the feminism in me, especially in Harriet's account.

For the entire I added I think they show my writing skills very well. I added 3 assignments, a newspaper I created for history, and 2 short essays also from political science. I decided to add these because I think it sums up how I write, and how much I use my opinion in my writing. As a writer, I think these works best represent me and my progress as such. All three assignments are history related, and I have scored well on each.

For the two essays I wrote in English, I believe that the one I wrote about of the slavery accounts of Frederick Douglass, and Harriet Jacobs was the better of the two. My true opinion shined through, especially with Harriet. For some reason her account brought out the feminist in me, and I think anyone could see that with my writing. I think I just overall had more interest in the slave essay in general. I personally think that it's easier to write about compared to the fireside poets because the subject was overall just more interesting.

Through the second quarter I think I've improved through the introduction portion of my essays. I have a better idea of how to start essays now, and the ideas come easier than before.

I know I still need help on topic sentences, but I'll get there eventually. Overall I think I'm generally a good writer, but people always need help in some ways.
